

Human Geography in the Mid-Atlantic

The human geography of the Mid-Atlantic is diverse. People in the region live in urban, rural, and suburban settings. The physical geography of the Mid-Atlantic provides the opportunity for people to perform different jobs. In the rural areas, farming or agriculture is the major industry. Farmers in the Mid-Atlantic grow grain, oats, and corn. People of the suburban Mid-Atlantic work in the seafood, coal mining, candy making, tourism and shipbuilding industries. Diverse industries and occupations are also found in many urban cities of the Mid-Atlantic. For example, New York City, one of the largest cities in the world, is well known for its finance, fashion design, publishing, and theater industries. New York City, Philadelphia, and Baltimore are well known for their ports, arts, music, colleges, and museums.

Use the map above to answer the following questions:

1. Coal mines can be found in the states of _____

2. Which state is home to the Liberty Bell? _____
3. Where might you find a person who harvests crabs or oysters? _____

4. Which states have large art, music, and trade centers? _____
